The Novus Mini Coyote - happily exploiting a legal grey area to give drivers real-time speed camera updates

The Novus Mini Coyote lets drivers radio in the location of hidden, newly-placed and mobile speed cameras, compiling a central database that will alert aggressive BMW drivers to when they need to slow down.

It isn't illegal - but presumably soon will be. We can't imagine THE LAW putting up with this sort of anti-social, rule-flouting behaviour for long. Here's how Novus describes its all-seeing, all-warning anti-radar machine...

"Mini Coyote is always up to date as it maintains a GSM/GPRS communication link with the Coyote servers to exchange information relative to fixed and mobiles speed cameras as well as frequent danger zones. Mini Coyote is very simple to use, it helps you travel securely and avoid the dangers of the road."

The Mini Coyote launches next week and can be pre-ordered from Novus here for £199. If you want one you'd better be quick, before owning and distributing them attracts a minimum five-year sentence and gets your car towed and crushed into a small cube.

I may be wrong, but I think that there are already products on the market that do this combined with GPS. Possibly even the TomTom using data feedback over a mobile phone?

Hi,

Just to clarify: the mini Coyote is made by Coyote Systems. Novus provides the fixed camera database and is one of the on-line retailer. For those who bought the French version, the www.coyotesystems.co.uk site now proposes to convert your French mini Coyote to a UK version: Check the link for details:
